Homemakers' Items

Normal room temperature - not sunlight - is the key to ripening tomatoes that have not reached full redness and ripeness. A temperature of 60 to 70 degrees is suggested.

The sunny windo, sill has no advantage over shaded or dark places such as the basement for the ripening process. In summer, the sun sometimes gives too much heat and light for proper coloring of picked tomatoes that are underripe. Too much sunlight may either prevent normal color development or make the color splotchy.

This effect of sunlight in ripening differs from the effect on tomatoes on the vine. Growing tomatoes benefit richly from light, a determining factor in the content of vitamin C. Summer field-grown tomatoes, which get abundant sunlight, contain about twice as much vitamin C as winter and fall greenhouse fruit.

The refrigerator, of course, is the place to store fresh tomatoes which are already ripe. But placing underripe tomatoes in the refrigerator stops the ripening process and makes the tomatoes watery.

To keep a bathing cap until the swimming season rolls around again, store it in a cool, dark place. Don't leave the cap anywhere near a heating pipe or radiator. Dust talcum powder or cornstarch between surfaces that touch each other. Wrap the cap in dark paper. Then, place it flat in a drawer or box.

Better LIGHT on the subject may mean Better GRADES on it, too!

BEFORE you frown at that report card, parents . . . take a look around your home and see what grade you'd give your lighting!

We don't promise that an improvement in lighting will produce straight A's from then on . . . but it is true that properly lighted study areas, good localized lighting plus general illumination . . . help get homework done more easily, more thoroughly, and more pleasantly!

Light up for fall and winter so that the whole family can enjoy the coming longer indoor hours! From Grandma right on down to Junior . . . BETTER LIGHT means BETTER SIGHT!

'Invisible Hotfoot' Plague Active During Summertime

"Oh, my aching feet," is a common year-round cry, but with the onset of hot summer weather it becomes a national lament. A recent health survey revealed that four out of every five persons are footsore during this time of the year, with "invisible hotfoot" leading the list.

Millions of people know how it feels: At its mildest an annoying irritation; at worst, a burning pain that makes work and play equally agonizing, and often blossoms forth into a rip-roaring case of athlete's foot or an even worse infection.

According to medical authorities, heat and humidity are only contributing factors to "invisible hotfoot." The main reason it blossoms in summer is that many people are especially careless about their footwear during this time of the year. For play an dsports activities, they often wear shoes whose soles do not permit their feet to breathe, and then they make the mistake of wearing the same type of footwear for walking, working, shopping, etc.

Feet thus do not get their required quota of cooling air, and cannot pass off heat and perspiration, as they would through the tiny interlaced fibers of leather soles. As a result, a "slow burn" sets in—easiest thing in the world to spread from feet to disposition and good looks.

What's good for our health isn't always pleasant to take, but in footwear there is no bad-tasting medicine. Doctors recommend leather soles to keep foot health up to par. Here is one health measure that's easy to take, because it means having a pair of feet that enjoy the utmost in coolness and comfort through the doggiest dog-days of summer.

Cotton estimates for year's yield are revised upward.

Priority Calls

Of all the telephone calls in the world, perhaps none are as urgent as those currently made through the telephone exchange at the United States Eighth Army Headquarters in Korea. The calls may involve the success or failure of combat missions ranging in strength from small patrols to a full-scale task force offensive. The Telephone Platoon of the 304th Signal Operations Battalion handles an average of 31,000 telephone calls during each 24-hour period on twelve switchboards grouped in banks of six for local and long distance convenience. When the platoon first began its Korean operation last July, an average of 2,600 calls were handled daily. Later, augmented by additional operators, the unit expanded its activities to facilitate all telephone communication in the United Nations Command. The original platoon, composed of five men has now grown to include approximately 100 operators. The unit maintains eleven switchboard locations throughout United Nations occupied Korea. At the main phone exchange, the operation is housed in four multiton vans; two for the local and long distance boards and two for the scores of incoming and outgoing lines connecting the 300 main phones and more than 50 direct trunk lines leading in and out of Korea.
